Vaping Overview

The Electronic Cigarette is a device that is battery-powered and produces inhaled doses of nicotine by way of a vapourized solution. They come in a wide variety of shapes and sizes, but the principles described here are the same for all of them – it's just that some have more power than others. The electronic cigarette makes use of a rechargeable battery that powers a heating element (coil). The e-liquid comes in contact with the hot coil and is then vapourized. The battery provides power to a switch, which when activated will heat the wire coil. In this wire coil is a wicking material (normally cotton). When e-liquid is placed onto this wicking material and reaches the coil, the e-liquid is then heated to the right temperature in order to turn it into vapour. As you draw from the electronic cigarette, vapour travels directly from the coil and into your mouth, where it is then inhaled by the user.

Brief History

The first patent to be filed for an electronic cigarette was in 1963 by Herbert Gilbert in the United States. Unfortunately, the patent was never commercially viable, which considering the climate of the day, where the health risks associated with smoking were far less well known and it was socially acceptable just about anywhere, is hardly surprising. It wasn't until 2003, when Hok Lik, a Chinese pharmacist and inventor whose father had died of smoking-related lung cancer, came up with a method of electronically vapourising nicotine solution that the modern idea of an electronic cigarette really took off. Hon Lik was supported in his idea by the company he worked for who enjoyed commercial success in China. By 2006/7 electronic cigarettes had made their way to Europe and the United States; since then their usage has increased significantly with UK users rising from 700,000 in 2012 to 2.6 million in 2015.

The Electronic Cigarette - Component

There are three main components to an electronic cigarette: the Battery Unit, the Head (sometimes referred to as the Tank or the Atomiser) and the Coil. It is important to remember that the battery unit, the head and the coil must be compatible. It can be dangerous to put incompatible products together. Most products can be bought as a kit, with all 3 components purchased together, and a reputable electronic cigarette store will be able to provide advice on setting it up. Items can also be purchased individually – helpful in replacing worn or damaged components.

The Battery Unit

The battery unit provides the power source for the electronic cigarette. They are rechargeable and come in a wide variety of shapes, sizes and colours. Some of them are 'fixed', in that there are no adjustments available to the user, and some are fully adjustable. Additionally, some battery units also afford a removable rechargeable battery, while many have the battery built in. In simple terms, the more powerful the battery, the more heat it can produce in the coil. Battery units will come with a fire button (the button you push when you wish to heat the coil and start vaping) and may also come with some user adjustable features such as an ability to vary the voltage or wattage to increase the power of the 'hit'. Often the fire button also serves as an on/off switch, with a set number of presses to turn it off or on.

The Head or Tank

The head contains the e-liquid and the coil. The e-liquid is normally inserted into the head by unscrewing either the top or the bottom and then inserting the nozzle of the e-liquid bottle and gently squeezing until you reach the desired fill level. Heads can be made of glass, plastic or metal, or a combination of these. There is normally a clear element (the glass or plastic) in order for you to monitor the fluid level. Some heads are more robust than others – in general terms heads made of glass and metal will cost more than those made of plastic, but will be less likely to sustain cracks or damage through dropping or impacts etc.

The Coil

The coil is just that; normally, a coil of wire wrapped around a wicking material such as cotton. The wicking material absorbs the e-liquid and when the coil is heated by the battery, the e-liquid in contact with the coil becomes vapour. The type of wire used in the coil and the way it is constructed will determine how much heat the coil can absorb. This can vary significantly and the coil used must be suited to the battery (and therefore the power available) it is connected to. Generally speaking, coils are specific to a manufacturer and model of electronic cigarette; there is no 'standard' coil. Also, coils are consumable items and last approximately 2-5 weeks depending on usage – after which you will need to replace it. This is a fairly straightforward task, but we will be happy to do this for you if you are unsure. Coils need to be primed before use – this is really about ensuring that all the wicking material is soaked with e-liquid. The simplest way to do this is to fill your device after changing the coil and leave it for 10 minutes to allow the e-liquid to soak into all of the wicking material. If the coil is not fully primed and parts of the wicking material are still relatively dry, you will experience what is known as a 'dry hit', which means that the wicking material might become burned. Indeed one of the indicators of a dry hit is a burnt taste to your vape. Some of the indications that you may need to change your coil are; a burnt taste, a discolouration of the e-liquid in the head, or a reduction in the ease of draw.

E-Liquid – A Brief Guide

Generally, e-cigarette fluid has four component parts:

- Nicotine (although many fluids are available without nicotine)
- Flavouring
- Propylene Glycol
- Vegetable Glycerin

Propylene Glycol and Vegetable Glycerin are used to produce the vapour and the flavouring produces the taste and aroma.

Propylene Glycol (referred to as PG within vaping communities) is a colourless liquid. It is nearly odourless, but has a faint, sweet smell. In addition to its use in electronic cigarette fluid, PG is also used in various foodstuffs such as coffee based drinks, ice cream and soda, as well as in some vapourisers used in the delivery of pharmaceuticals.

Vegetable Glycerin (referred to as VG within vaping communities) is a colourless, odourless and thick liquid. In addition to its use in electronic cigarette fluid, VG is also used in the food industry as a filler in commercially prepared low fat foods. It is also found in medical and personal care products such as cough syrup, toothpaste, mouth wash, skin care products, shaving cream and soap.

Electronic cigarette fluids are made up of a combination of PG and VG. The ratio of these fluids will determine what sort of equipment it can be used in and what sort of vaping effect the user wants to achieve (for example 'cloudchasers' – those that want to achieve large clouds of dense vapour – will use a high VG fluid).

In a general sense, the higher PG fluids provide users with the throat hit that is reminiscent of smoking, while the higher VG fluids are smoother on the throat. However, higher VG fluids will perform better in more powerful equipment with a coil capable of being heated to a higher temperature. Entry level fluids tend to be around 80% PG and 20% VG. These fluids function well in regular equipment (as opposed to sub-ohm equipment which uses more power and a coil resistance of less than one ohm). Higher VG fluids (up to 90% VG) function better in sub-ohm equipment which provides more power and a higher coil temperature. Because of the volume of vapour that is produced from sub-ohm vaping, the nicotine strength of high VG fluids tend to be lower than those available with high PG fluids.

Nicotine content is measured in mg or as a percentage depending on the fluid manufacturer. Regular fluids are often available in 0, 6 12 or 18mg. These figures equate to 0%, 0.6%, 1.2% and 1.8% respectively – they are just different methods of measuring nicotine content. The following can be used as a guide to nicotine strength for use in regular equipment:

- | | |
|-----------------|------|
| - Heavy smoker | 1.8% |
| - Medium Smoker | 1.2% |
| - Light smoker | 0.6% |

For the regular vaper, a 10 ml bottle will last 3-5 days depending on usage. High VG liquids, used for sub-ohm vaping tend to be available in 0.3% or 0.6% (3 mg or 6 mg).

Atomisers/Coils

Atomisers or coils are the components that draw in the fluid which it then heats – releasing the vapour. They need to be regularly replaced to ensure the smooth running of your device. If you notice that your vape has a burnt taste or that you are not getting the hit that you would normally expect, your atomiser probably needs replacing. Although it varies between devices and depends on usage rates, an average user could probably expect to change the atomiser every few weeks. Heavy users will need to change the atomiser more often. It's always worth having a spare atomiser with you, so your enjoyment of your
